The Flower and its Culture

Hemerocallis, or daylilies, have been given many names—poorpoor, the lazy man's flower, tough and terrific, the perfect, even supreme, summer perennial—all of which are well-earned. The increasing popularity of this perennial is due both to its beauty in the garden and the ease with which it is grown. It's a colorful subject, very satisfactory and practical, supplying a wealth of bloom at a time when most of the garden is in a lull. It performs best with good care and attention, but will even survive drought and neglect when well established. It will thrive in any soil, take midwinter cold and midsummer heat, and is scarcely bothered by pests or disease. What more could one ask?

Daylilies may be planted almost any time during the growing season, even when in bloom, in fact, all times except when the ground is frozen or expected soon. The preferred season to plant is from early spring to late fall.

Daylilies may be placed anywhere except in dense shade, performing best in full sun to part shade. Their uses are many—grow them in clumps or drifts, border walks, steps or driveways, place them against walls or fences, put them on slopes for retaining, naturalize them, set them in front of evergreens, or make them the mainstay of the border.

Plant daylilies in well-spaded garden soil, mixed with compost or manure or a well-balanced fertilizer. Set plant on slight mound in hole, allowing roots to spread out around it, and cover bottom of foliage fan only one inch with soil. Water well during planting and blooming seasons. Fertilize in spring and fall with a good commercial fertilizer. Allow 2 to 3 feet between plants. For more effective display, plant at least 3 of each variety.
